INDEX

EXPLANATORY NOTE TO INDEX

These statutes contain more than 15,200 sections of up-to-date statutory law. Every section has been checked and indexed. There are over 150,000 index references.

A study of the indexing system used will make the finding of law much easier.

If the subject is not indexed it has probably been repealed. See table of statutory changes made by the 1967 legislature.

This index has been revised to conform generally to the more standard classifications of law found in the commonly used legal publications, except where it has been necessary to create special headings to conform to our peculiar statutes.

A detailed index to each subject item, whenever a necessary reference is used, would make the size of an index prohibitive since the same subject item may be found in a dozen or more places.

While many lawyers desire a detailed index under each subject item others prefer to have all related references in one place under the general subject head with adequate cross reference to other related subjects.

We have endeavored to meet both of these plans by assembling, wherever possible, all statutory references to a law under a general subject heading with ample cross references from other related or equivalent titles to the main general subject. But whenever we find the subject title can be amply indexed with relatively few every subtitle reference thus eliminating unneeded cross references. statutory references these are repeated throughout the index under When cross references are needed we have also, wherever possible, given the chapter number or section reference, so that the searcher can go direct to the chapter or section if desired.

The reference entries have been phrased to bring out the noun or main thought of the statute, in the title or subtitle catch words.

It is hoped that the plan of following the general classification of the law will be acceptable and that the utility of the statutes will be increased by the use of this index, though occasions probably will arise when improvements will be needed.
